COLD & RAINY WEATHER CAN KILL

This weekend, Los Angeles will continue to experience cold and rainy weather. People experiencing homelessness are at higher risk of suffering from and dying of hypothermia, when a person's body temperature dips below 95 degrees. An L.A. Taco analysis found that 28 people have died of hypothermia since 2016, and that almost all deaths occurred in December, January or February— typically LA County's coldest and wettest months of the year.

L.A. Taco reporter Lexis Olivier-Ray interviewed MB, who lives at an encampment on the border of Ktown and Mid City, who recommends securing your clothes from getting wet when it rains. The chances of getting hypothermia increase if you're wet, because water transfers heat away from your body. Olivier-Ray also spoke to We the Unhoused's Theo Henderson, who recalls having to sleep outside in the cold after all of his belongings were confiscated during a sweep.

"That was the longest, scariest night because I had to really stay awake," Henderson described. (continued)

“You’re exhausted but you’re scared to go to sleep because it’s cold.” According to the Mayo Clinic, “Your tolerance for cold diminishes when you are fatigued.”

We recommend insulating and waterproofing your tent or shelter, and gathering as many waterproof, warm-weather clothes and blankets as possible. Ktown For All has tents, tarps, laundry kits and other cold and rainy-weather supplies to hand out on request anytime.
